Aamir Liaquat Hussain (1971–2022) was a prominent yet highly controversial Pakistani figure, known for his work as a politician, columnist, and popular television host. Despite being a celebrated media personality, frequently listed among The 500 Most Influential Muslims, his career was defined by significant scandals, particularly concerning his academic qualifications.

Hussain served two terms as a Member of the National Assembly (2002–2007 and 2018–2022), holding the post of Minister of State for Religious Affairs during his first term. However, his public life was persistently marred by disputes over his claimed degrees, including a BA, an MBBS, and a Master's in Islamic Studies.

Key takeaways from his life include:

- * Widespread Acclaim: He was a top-ranked television anchor in Pakistan and recognized internationally for his influence in the Muslim world.
- * Degree Controversies: His academic claims were consistently refuted. Pakistan's Higher Education Commission (HEC) declared his BA degree from Trinity College and University fake, and other universities rejected his qualifications.
- * Confirmed Fake Degree: The most definitive scandal emerged in 2015 when the Federal Investigation Agency (FIA) found evidence that he had purchased a fake degree from Axact-owned Ashwood University for over $1,100, a fact to which he later confessed.
- * Death: Hussain passed away on June 9, 2022, at his residence in Karachi. Police reported the cause as suffocation from smoke produced by a generator.
